Stories of Denmark 1660-2000

Room 205 / Exhibition case 8 The Society of Rank

During absolutism all subjects were in theory equal before the king, but in practice society was divided into four estates: The nobility, the clergy, commoners and peasants. There were vast differences in the lifestyles of the various estates, something reflected in their dress. There were rules for the materials each estate could wear. For example, the higher estates could wear silk and gold embroidery, whereas the peasants had to wear homespun cloth.

Room 224 Adelgade 91A

This flat was in a four-storey back building built in 1773. There were four small apartments with a living room and a small kitchen on each floor. Water had to be carried from the yard, where the building's three latrines were also located. The residents were labourers, artisans, widows and other low-income groups. Each flat was home to 2-4 people, and some also had lodgers.

Rum 205 / Montre 8 Standssamfundet

Under enevælden var alle undersætter i principippet ligestillet under kongen. I praksis var samfonden opdelt i fire stænder – adel, præster, borgere og bønder. Der var meget stor forskel på stændernes levevis, det sås bl.a. i klædedragten. Her var der regler for, hvilke materialer man måtte bruge. De øverste stænder måtte f.eks. klæde sig i silke og guldbroderi, mens bondestanden skulle gå i hjemmelavet tøj.

Rum 224 Adelgade 91A

Lejligheden lå i et fire-etages baghus fra 1773. På hver etage var der fire små lejligheder med stue og lille køkken. Vand måtte bæres op fra gården, hvor også husets tre lokummer stod. Beboerne var arbejdsmænd, håndværkere, enker og andre lav-lønnede. I hver lejlighed boede fra to til fire personer, nogle havde tilmed logerende.

Rum 234 Dansk Kvindesamfunds banner

Bannerets motiv er pige med guldhornet – hende, der i 1639 fandt det første af de to berømte horn. Banneret er tegnet i 1911 af kunstneren Anna E. Munch, og det blev båret forrest, da kvinderne i 1915 gik i optog til kongen for at takke for deres nyerhvervede valgret. Den havde Dansk Kvindesamfund kæmpet for siden oprettelsen i 1871.

Rum 237 Parcelhusstuen

Sådan indrettede et ungts par, Elni og Tage, i 1972 deres første hjem i Benløse på Sjælland. Ryatæpperne og puderne knyttede Tage, mens de var forlovede. Fra 1960-1980 fik mange danskere råd til at købe eget hus. Over halvdelen af de nyopførte huse var parcelhuse, og rundt om de fleste byer opstod parcelhuskvarterer.

Room 234 Banner of the Danish Women's Society

The banner is decorated with the girl with the golden horn – the girl who in 1639 found the first of the famous golden horns. The banner was designed by the artist Anna E. Munch in 1911, and was carried at the front of a procession of women to thank the king for their newly acquired right to vote. The Danish Women's Society had campaigned for the right to vote since its foundation in 1871.

Room 237 Housing Estate Living Room

This is how the young couple Elni and Tage furnished their first home in Benløse, Zealand. Elni's husband Tage made the rya rugs and cushions during their engagement. From 1960-80 it became possible for many Danes to buy their own homes. More than half of the new houses were on housing estates, which emerged on the outskirts of most towns.

NATIONALMUSEET

1. SAL

Danmarks Middelalder og Renæssance

Rum 101 Åbykrucifikset

Danmarks ældste krucifiks er fra omkring år 1100. Korset er væk; kun Kristus er tilbage. Han er vist som en sejrende konge, der med åbne øjne ser ud på sin verden. På hovedet har denne romanske Kristus ikke en tornekrone, men en kongekrone, og kun de store hænder er gennemboret af nagler.

114

Rum 114 Kronborgtapeterne

På det største af rummets otte billedepper med danske konger står Frederik 2. ved siden af tronfolgeren, den unge Christian 4. Et lysskæf fra himlen stråler ned bag kongen som symbol på magtens guddommelige oprindelse. I baggrunden ses Kronborg og Frederiksborg slot samt to mænd i samtal – den ene er muligvis Tycho Brahe.

Rum 126 Cylinderperspektiv

Frederik 3.s cylinderbord er et portræt af regenten og hans dronning, Sophie Amalie. Billedet er malet direkte på bordet i et kunstfærdigt forvrænget perspektiv, så det kun kan ses afspeilet i glascylinderen. Bordet hørte til Det kongelige Kunstkammer, som Frederik 3. oprettede o. 1650.

Room 101

The Aaby Crucifix

Denmark's oldest crucifix is from around 1100. The Cross is missing and only Christ remains. He is depicted as a triumphant monarch surveying his kingdom. This Romanesque figure of Christ is wearing a royal crown instead of a crown of thorns, and only the large hands are pierced by nails.

Room 106 Drinking horns

Drinking horns were popular in the guilds of Denmark's towns and cities. Skilled goldsmiths made them using the horns of Southern European cattle. The large horns were not intended to be put on the table. Instead they were to be passed from hand to hand and emptied on festive occasions to foster a feeling of solidarity. The penalty for spilling anything from the horn was a fine to be paid into the guild coffers.

Room 114

The Kronborg tapestries

On the largest of the room's eight tapestries depicting Danish kings Frederik II stands next to the heir to the throne, the young Christian IV. Celestial light shines behind the king, a symbol of the divine origins of his power. Kronborg and Frederiksborg castles can be seen in the background, together with two men in conversation, one of who could be Tycho Brahe.

Room 126

Cylinder perspective

Frederik III's cylinder table is decorated with a portrait of the sovereign and Queen Sophie Amalie. The portrait is painted directly onto the table from an ingenious distorted perspective, enabling it to be seen reflected in the glass cylinder. The table belonged to The Royal Kunstkammer, which Frederik III established around 1650.

Prinsens Palæ

131

Rum 131 Orienten på væggen

Tapetet med de to fornemme kinesere er fra herregården Gammel Estrup ved Randers. Det er malet på lærred, der er grundet med gips, som imitation af gyldenlæder. Forlægget for nogle af tapetets motiver var en serie kobberstik med kinesiske scenerier af den tyske kunstner Martin Engelbrecht.

Rum 132 Galleriet

Galleriet er den brede gang, der forbinder kabinetter og sovegemakker. Her var god plads til udsøgt kunsthåndværk. Stukkaturen i loftet, panelerne og egeparket gulvet menes at være de originale, møbler og ovne er fra 1700-tallets første halvdel.

Rum 133 Riddersalen

Prinsens Palæ, hvor Nationalmuseet har til huse, var i 1700-tallet bolig for medlemmer af kongehuset. Det nuværende palæ blev opført 1743-1744 af Nicolai Eigtved, og herfra stammer også Riddersalen – palæets største og fornemste rum. Den lange væg er beklædt med de oprindelige flamske gobeliner.

135

Rum 132 Skildpadde-spejlet

I Galleriet hænger et enestående spejl fra 1720'erne med ramme af skildpaddeskjold. Skildpadden var et meget kostbart materiale, og der findes ikke andre af den slags spejle i Danmark. Spejlet har tilhørt familien von Plessen, der stammede fra Tyskland.

Rum 135 Riddersalen

Prinsens Palæ, hvor Nationalmuseet har til huse, var i 1700-tallet bolig for medlemmer af kongehuset. Det nuværende palæ blev opført 1743-1744 af Nicolai Eigtved, og herfra stammer også Riddersalen – palæets største og fornemste rum. Den lange væg er beklædt med de oprindelige flamske gobeliner.

Den kgl. Mønt- og Medaillesamling

Rum 141 / Montre 2 nr. 10 Slaget i Køge Bugt

Guldmedaljen til minde om Niels Juul og den danske flådes sejr over svenskerne i Køge Bugt 1677 er den største og mest berømte danske medalje. Den kongelige Mønt har præget. Man ser bl.a. krudtrøgen fra det danske skibs kanoner, mens svenskerne stryger flaget.

The Royal Collection of Coins and Medals

Room 141 / Case 2 nr. 10 Medal of the Battle of Køge Bay

This gold medal to commemorate Niels Juul's and the Danish navy's victory over the Swedes in Køge Bay in 1677 is the largest and most famous Danish medal made by the Royal Mint. The gunpowder smoke from the canons on the Danish ships can be seen as the Swedes strike their colours.

Room 132 Turtle-shell mirror

A unique mirror from the 1720s with a turtle-shell frame hangs in the Gallery. Turtle shell was an extremely expensive material, and the mirror is the only one of its kind in Denmark. It belonged to the von Plessen family, who were originally from Germany.

132

Rum 135 The Great Hall

The Prince's Palace, which houses the National Museum, was home to members of the royal family in the 18th century. The current palace, including the Great Hall – the biggest and finest of its rooms – was built by Nicolai Eigtved between 1743 and 1744. The long wall is adorned with the original Flemish tapestries.

Room 144 / Case 36 nr. 9 Denmark's oldest Coin

The coin Sweyn Forkbeard had struck 1,000 years ago can hardly be described as large, but it is the first coin to bear the name of Denmark and a Danish king. The names are in Latin, and the portrait of Sweyn is a copy of a portrait of the English king Ethelred on a similar coin. The silver coin was struck around 995.

The Prince's Palace

Room 131 The orient on the wall

The wall-hanging featuring the two distinguished Chinese figures is from the Gammel Estrup manor house near Randers. It is painted on canvas, which has been primed with plaster to imitate gilt leather.

Room 132 The gallery

The Gallery consists of a wide corridor that linked rooms and sleeping quarters, and featured plenty of space for exquisite handicrafts. The stucco in the ceiling, the panels and the oak parquet floor are all thought to be original. The furniture and stove are from the early 18th century.
